Defending Your Online Reputation Against Astroturfing and Fake Reviews

By Jason Castillo

(This is the second in a two-part article on defending you, your law firms and your client’s online reputation. In the first article I detailed a few proactive points to consider when faced with genuine negative online reviews. In this article I will focus on astroturfing and fake reviews from competitors and disgruntled ex-employees.)

Protecting your online reputation has become an extremely important topic for attorneys and the client's that they represent. I was talking to a business attorney a few months back about this issue and it was this conversation that spawned these two articles. One of her business clients was getting numerous negative anonymous comments on review websites like Yelp. Her client was convinced that these were not genuinely bad reviews – they were coming from a disgruntled ex-employee who was unceremoniously terminated a few months before the negative online reviews began popping up. The attorney had no idea where to even begin to help her client.

Increasingly more attorneys, law firms and businesses have also had to deal with this difficult dilemma – what to do about fake online reviews written by ex-employees and competitors. The effects of these negative reviews cannot be understated. Numerous studies point to the fact that a few bad reviews can lead to thousands of dollars in lost business and also the loss of clients for attorneys. For example, studies have shown that a one star increase in Yelp ratings can boost a restaurant’s sales by nearly 10%! And Yelp has even recently sued unscrupulous law firms that have tried to gain an unfair advantage by having employees and others post fake reviews. In today’s Web 2.0 World, both negative and positive reviews mean the loss or gain of revenue for law firms and businesses alike.

It’s not surprising that two divergent online industries have sprung up in the last few years in regards to websites like Yelp, RipOffReport and even Google places and search. One is the online reputation management industry that has become a $5 Billion a year business and seeks to legitimately cultivate and protect law firms and businesses online reputation and brand. And the polar opposite – companies that write and sell fake online reviews. These companies often contract with people in third world companies that have never legitimately used the products they endorse or post negative reviews about. This has become a profitable business with companies that have never legitimately used the products they endorse or post negative reviews about.

Couple this with astroturfing – and business and many law firms and business have an uphill battle defending their Internet turf. Often times, astroturfing is the act of one company falsely bad mouthing a competitor’s law firm or business online. One of the most egregious examples of astroturfing involved Whole Foods CEO John Mackey who posted negative false anonymous comments in Yahoo chat rooms dedicated to stock trading about rival company Rival Oats … right before a planned acquisition of the company.¹

So how do you spot these fake reviews about your law firm or your client's businesses?

Attorneys and businesses may be able to identify fake reviews by any of the following signs:

- The reviews are a part of a significant spike in reviews about a particular business over a small period of time.
- A number of the reviews are written from the same email or IP address as the business reviewed.
- They are written in overly positive language or “marketing speak.”
- Many of the reviews about the business or law firm are written with very similar language.

You might ask yourself just how big is this problem? As mentioned in the previous article, after bringing an action against a numerous companies New York Attorney General Eric Schneiderman announced in September 2013 that nineteen companies agreed to stop writing fake Yelp reviews and pay over $350,000 in fines. Some law firms were even caught up in this astroturfing dragnet because they were writing false online testimonials about their own law firms! Yelp itself recently sued two companies for selling and posting fake reviews. And Samsung was recently fined $340,300 for hiring people to criticize HTC's products.

While many people feel that nothing can be done about these fake online reviews, you can take action to protect your law firm and your client’s business if you feel that you or your client’s have been the victims of fake reviews. Initially, you should write a letter to the website or company asking them to remove the fraudulent posts and threatening legal action if they don’t cooperate and remove the fake content. If this does not work then it is probably time to consider legal action.

One major issue facing law firms and business, however, is the difficulty in having content removed from websites. For example, the Communications Decency Act (CDA) provides immunity for websites from third party posts. This makes it difficult to have content removed from websites – even if it is fraudulent. Many websites feel that they don’t have to remove the false information because they are insulated from liability by the CDA.

However, you may be successful at having false content removed through either a defamation lawsuit or a trademark claim under the Lanham Act. Because managing companies and clients online reputation has become paramount, some law firms have recently begun online defamation practice groups. Over the last two years the law firm Vorys, Sater, Seymour and Pease has developed an entire practice area devoted to address online reputation management and defamation issues. According an attorney at the firm, the firm estimates they are working on 20-30 cases at any given time and online defamation currently accounts for nearly 70% of the work performed by the firm’s Internet Crisis Group. If you think that your law firm or client’s reputation has been unfairly harmed, it may be time to consider a defamation lawsuit against the offending party.

The Lanham Act may also be another path to redress. Trademark law seeks to protect a company’s mark and prohibits false advertising by competitors. Negative reviews are essentially false advertising and under the Lanham Act businesses can recover significant damages if a violation if found. A few of the remedies include treble damages, disgorgement of the competitors’ profits, costs of corrective advertising and attorney’s fees if the publication of the false review is willful – which many times it is. Often times a subpoena may be necessary to find the identity of the anonymous poster.

A 2012 Pennsylvania case illustrates that these are valid methods to combat these fraudulent negative online reviews. In the case, a marble and Granite business discovered that several posts on various product review websites originated from its competitor’s IP address. The court decided that the fake reviews possibly constituted defamation and trademark infringement, thus creating a possible violation of the Lanham Act and the Court subsequently denied the competitor’s motion to dismiss the case (see: NTP Marble, Inc. v. AAA Hellenic Marble, Inc., 2012 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 93856 (E.D. Pa. Feb. 24, 2012).

The bottom line is that it’s an uphill battle to get malicious reviews removed. I believe the best strategy is to be proactive and put effort into your online reputation before anything ever happens – don’t wait until there’s a negative review damaging your online reputation. That way your positive feedback will outweigh any negativity that reaches your profiles. If you are vigilant and consistently work on your positive reviews, a few bad eggs won’t have that large of an impact.

For example, if you have no online reviews and a disgruntled employee decides to bash your firm online, then that’s all your prospects are going to see. But if there are several positive reviews and you already have a high rating, that one negative or malicious review won’t have as much juice. Readers will see that the good heavily outweigh the bad.

And if fraudulent negative reviews begin to pile up, it might be time to consider further action. Write a letter threatening legal action to the website hosting the fake content. If this does not work, it may be time to consider legal action. If you don’t have experience handling online defamation or Lanham Act claims, then consult with an attorney or firm who has experience in this area. You must work hard to protect the reputation and goodwill you have painstakingly built over the years and you must also work to protect the clients and businesses that you counsel and represent.

THE END OF AN ERA – THE LAST CIVIL COURTROOM IN EAST COUNTY CLOSES

by Mark R. Raftery

After years of insufficient funding from the State of California, the San Diego County Superior Court closed its last full time civil courtroom in El Cajon on January 13, 2014 and transferred Judge Eddie Sturgeon to Department 67 at the Hall of Justice in downtown San Diego. With his reassignment, Judge Sturgeon also took his current case load of approximately 900 civil cases with him.

The closure of Department 14 as a general civil department “marks the end of a one-year effort to consolidate most Superior Court civil operations to the Central Courthouse in downtown San Diego,” according to recent News Release from the Superior Court. To deal with an unprecedented $33,000,000 budget reduction over the last few fiscal years, the San Diego County Superior Court has shuttered the courthouse in Ramona, closed the business offices in East County and South Bay, closed both the East and South County Civil operations, and lost over 300 employees. Over the last five years, the East County Division of the Superior Court alone has lost twenty-five percent of its work force.

The closure of Department 14 marks the first time in over thirty years that the over 500,000 people of East County have not had a courtroom in El Cajon to resolve general civil matters involving, for example, personal injury, business, and real estate disputes. Currently, all civil cases arising out of the East County that previously would have been filed in El Cajon, and heard by Judge Sturgeon, must now be filed in downtown San Diego, and will be randomly assigned to one of several Independent Calendar Judges.

His transfer to Department 67 marks the first time that Judge Sturgeon, first appointed to the Municipal Court by Governor George Deukmejian in 1988, and elevated to the Superior Court in 1998, has ever presided over a courtroom anywhere other than in El Cajon. He is the only San Diego County Superior Court Judge who has spent an entire judicial career in East County.

Born and raised in El Cajon, Judge Sturgeon graduated from San Diego State University. He then graduated from the University of Santa Clara School of Law in 1974 and returned to El Cajon to practice law. He had a general civil practice and eventually a large criminal defense practice before being appointed to the bench. He has always enjoyed and will miss the “camaraderie and collegiality of the East County bar.”

Although he understands the budget realities that caused the closing of his civil department in El Cajon, Judge Sturgeon has characterized the closing of all civil operations in El Cajon as a “travesty” that will deeply and adversely affect the administration of justice for the people of East County. It is “deeply disappointing,” he said, that people from East County, as well as the South Bay, must now travel to downtown San Diego to inspect court records, file pleadings, and attend hearings.

Although he "looks forward" to joining the downtown bench and working in the Central Division he remains “committed to returning one or more civil courtrooms to East County and South Bay” as soon as additional funding is received by the State of California. He is “cautiously optimistic” that additional funding will be provided to the San Diego Superior Court by the State of California as the economy improves. He welcomes the continued support of the East County legal community and especially the Foothills Bar Association in working to return one or two civil departments to East County and South Bay. Keith Jones, the newly elected President of the Foothills Bar Association, has pledged that the Association is “committed to working closely with the court” to make that happen.

The Foothills Bar Association seeks a chairperson for the criminal law section. Responsibilities will involve scheduling speakers for lunch time MCLE programs on topics of interest and providing Section meeting status reports to the Foothills Board of Directors. Interested attorneys should contact Cheryl Stengel at clstengel@outlook.com.

Join the SDVLP Family Law Clinic
By Benita Ghura, Librarian

DID YOU KNOW THAT 74% OF ALL FAMILY LAW CASES IN SAN DIEGO ARE SELF-LITIGATED? This puts a huge burden on the limited resources of the judiciary and court personnel. What can be done? Well, one solution created by the San Diego Volunteer Lawyer Program (SDVLP) and the San Diego Law Library is to offer a family law clinic.

The clinic operates every Wednesday from 3:30 – 5:45 p.m. at the Law Library’s downtown location and represents low-income individuals in all areas of family law such as dissolution of marriage, restraining orders, adoptions and paternity cases to name a few. The clinic is only able to accept clients if there are enough volunteer attorneys willing to represent the clients on a pro bono basis. To date, approximately, 45 individuals have received help from the clinic’s 13 volunteer attorneys.

The clinic is a great way for new attorneys to gain practical, real-life experience in a supportive environment. For experienced attorneys, the clinic is a rewarding experience to give back to the community and mentor new attorneys. In addition, attorney volunteers earn credit towards a California State Bar Wiley W. Manuel Certificate for Pro Bono Services.

All attorneys who volunteer for the clinic may attend a free one hour training session held prior to each clinic. The trainings cover a variety of topics in family law basics such as child custody and visitation, child and spousal support and domestic violence restraining orders. The training sessions occur every Wednesday from 2:00 – 3:00 p.m. at the Law Library. All attendees receive one hour MCLE credit.

In addition to the training sessions, new attorneys receive guidance and mentoring from experienced attorneys. Initially, the new attorney pairs up with an experienced attorney during the client interview until the new attorney becomes more comfortable with the interview process. As the new attorney gains experience, the option to represent clients directly from intake to judgment, including court appearances, is available. A SDVLP supervising attorney is always available to answer questions, even for direct representation cases.

To learn more or to sign up for the clinic, contact Kris Jacobs at kjacobs@sdvlp.org. To learn more about the programs available at the San Diego Law Library, contact Benita Ghura at: bghura@sdcpll.org.
