Forget the Kids … Who Gets the Dog??

By Koryn K. Sheppard, Esq., P.M.P.

“Pet custody” is a recent topic of interest in Family Law. How to treat pets in a divorce is a somewhat evolving issue. While the standard practice for years has been to treat pets as any other property, there has been a more recent trend of making more creative orders about pets. Typically, this applies to dogs more often than other types of pets.

Variations of “pet custody” that I’ve seen include sharing and exchanging the pet like a child or exchanging the family pet with the children. An attorney friend of mine told me that she had a case where a couple was ordered to share a dog despite living in different states. The dog was in California for 6 months and in Virginia for 6 months.

Practitioners I have spoken to take a dim view of “pet custody.” Several have noted that this simply is another issue for people to fight over during a divorce and is often a way for one party to simply try to injure another party emotionally and financially. Another practitioner commented that it’s simply a means for people to stay connected when they should be moving on. Another attorney friend of mine told me that her case failed to settle at Mandatory Settlement Conference due in large part because the parties could not agree on who keeps the dogs. This means that the case is going to trial over who gets the dogs. In short, they generally feel that pets should be treated like any other property item.

Interestingly, this issue often reverses course when the pet is considered more of an expense than an asset. Pets require food, maintenance, veterinary care, boarding, etc. Family law practitioners are likely familiar with a now infamous case in which one family law practitioner left two dogs at the office of another practitioner when the clients could not determine who should maintain responsibility of the dogs.

In a hypothetical scenario, one party did not want to shoulder the expense of maintaining the parties’ dogs. The other party would not take the dogs but cited the Family Law Automatic Temporary Restraining Orders (preventing the disposal of community property) when the first party threatened to take the dogs to the animal shelter. In a similar hypothetical case, one party left pets in the family residence, but then relocated. The party remaining in the home wanted the pets removed and wanted to discontinue the utilities while away for several months. This lead to a dispute about financial responsibility for maintaining the space and utilities for housing the animals.

Pets are akin to sentimental property items, such as photographs, which are difficult to place a true dollar value on. Some judicial officers seems to place particular value on the emotional connection people have with pets, recognizing the sentimental value of pets. Family law courts are known to be “courts of equity”. Thus, in family law, judges generally have fairly broad discretion in decision making. How this issue will be treated in any particular case may depend on which judge is hearing the case. Emotional support animals and service animals add another layer of complexity to the findings of fact and outcome of such hearings. Practitioners may need to be prepared to show up with more than a “bill of sale” in order to argue the pet’s true value; and clients may need to prepare to fund evidentiary hearings over who gets the dog.

Perfected Title Revisited and Restated

By Keith A. Jones, Esq.

In February 2017, my Foothill Bar Association newsletter article concerned a 2016 San Diego eviction case. In that case, the plaintiff had purchased the subject property at an 8:00 a.m. foreclosure sale, and later that day served the defendant occupant with the requisite notice to vacate. When the defendant didn't surrender possession after three days, the plaintiff filed the unlawful detainer action. Fifteen days elapsed between the foreclosure sale date and when the plaintiff recorded the trustee's deed, which recording also occurred after the plaintiff filed the eviction lawsuit.

The defendant unsuccessfully argued at trial that the notice was defective because the plaintiff had not first perfected its title to the property by recording the deed. On appeal, the defendant succeeded by arguing that purchasing property at a sale did not equate to transfer of title evidenced by the recording of a deed with public records. The defendant claimed that since the transfer of title had not been perfected with a recording, he did not have an opportunity to confirm via official public records that the plaintiff was the true owner. San Diego's Appellate Division agreed with the defendant, relying on Code of Civil Procedure Section 1161a(b)(3) to conclude that the plaintiff's notice had been served before perfecting title rendering it fatally defective.

No so fast! In March 2017, in an appeal in a Ventura County eviction case, the Second Appellate District rejected the San Diego Appellate Division's decision under slightly different facts as to timing. As stated in my February article, a plaintiff in an unlawful detainer action needs to prove ownership or right to possession of the subject property as a prima facie element in order to evict an occupant. The San Diego Appellate Division concluded that the plaintiff needed to establish that perfected title existed when it served a notice to vacate on the occupant.

In the Ventura case, the plaintiff served the notice to vacate on the defendant the day after purchasing the property at a foreclosure sale. Five days after serving the notice, the plaintiff recorded the deed transferring the property but didn't file the unlawful detainer complaint five weeks after serving the notice. The plaintiff succeeded at a bifurcated trial which first addressed whether the defendant's lease had been extinguished by the foreclosure sale. The defendant surrendered possession after losing on the first phase, reserving its right to appeal the trial court's decision and to challenge whether the notice was defective as being premature.

The appellate court in the Ventura case also relied on Code of Civil Procedure Section 1161a(b)(3) to reach its decision, but it concluded that the plaintiff's notice to vacate was effective even though it was served before it recorded the trustee's deed. The Ventura appellate bench honed in on the statute's phrase that states the occupant "may be removed" after the title "has been duly perfected." Therefore, since the plaintiff established perfected title at the time of filing the complaint, the notice to vacate was not defective.

The Ventura decision reasoned that the plaintiff needed to prove perfected ownership at trial, and that the defendant would have an opportunity at trial to prove that the plaintiff had not perfected title as a defense. Additionally, it disagreed with the San Diego case and concluded that a party does not begin an unlawful detainer action by serving a notice to quit. Rather, it does so when it files the lawsuit at which time the court has jurisdiction over the parties.

As lawyers, we know that the laws change via the legislative system as well as via the judicial system that interprets the laws. Whether this issue will end up before the California Supreme Court since the appellate districts remains to be seen. Or perhaps we'll hear from another appellate district which concludes that proof of perfected title by time of trial as opposed to time of filing the complaint suffices. After all, an owner can't "remove" the occupant without a judgment.
